Dear Powerline Team:

Fourteen years ago, I walked into your boot camp seminar in Utah as a recently retired paver contractor who wasn't quite ready to sit still. I left with a pressure washing machine, and a trailer, shipped to Dayton, Ohio — and honestly, it turned out to be one of the best investments of my life. I wanted to write and tell you that.

My background was in commercial paver installation, estimating and certifying installation crews around the country, so I knew pavers. But building a restoration business — cleaning, polymeric sand, sealing — around that knowledge was a different challenge, and your team didn't just sell me a machine and wish me luck. Over the years, you were genuinely there: answering questions, sharing knowledge, acting more like mentors than a vendor I'd bought equipment from once. That kind of support doesn't end at the sale, and I've never forgotten it. When my original machine finally wore out about five years ago, there was no question where I'd go for the replacement.

Fourteen years later, that one seminar turned into a business that has done nothing but restore paver driveways, patios, and walkways — and done it well. Now I'm 74, ready to slow down, and my wife and I are relocating to Nevada to be closer to our kids and grandkids. So I'm putting the business up for sale: the equipment, both Transit vans, and the company itself, here in Ohio.

I know your seminars bring together people from all over the country who are looking to start or grow exactly this kind of business. If you know of anyone — a past attendee, a current student, or someone in your network — who might be interested in stepping into an established paver restoration business rather than starting from scratch, I'd be grateful if you'd point them my way.

Feel free to use my story however it might help other people considering that same leap I took fourteen years ago. Powerline played a real part in making it work, and I wanted you to know that. Thank you again for everything over the years.

Warm regards,
